WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

Moderately strong, gusty westerly winds likely to develop along and east of the Cascade/Sierra crest for a few hours this afternoon. Isolated daily thunderstorms and new starts likely today into next week over the northern and eastern areas especially, but Significant Fire Potential expected to remain low.

There may be some thunderstorms in our western areas and possibly this morning. Confidence in this happening is not very high so the High Risk for Significant Fire Potential designations for those thunderstorms is marginal. Another weather event the incoming low will bring about is some moderately strong, gusty afternoon winds for our eastern areas this afternoon for a few hours.

Otherwise, daily thunderstorms in the region will continue, though activity may be minimal today the number and areal coverage of thunderstorms will increase over the weekend. The isolated and wetter nature of the upcoming thunderstorms will minimize Significant Fire Potential, which will most likely remain below High Risk designation. New fire starts or holdovers and potential for periods of rapid fire spread will continue to be in place, however. Temperatures will be cooling over the next few days toward more seasonably normal values with hottest inland locations backing off to mostly 100-105 this weekend into next week. Aside from the gusty winds this afternoon, daily winds will continue to mostly be relatively light and of locally driven diurnal patterns.

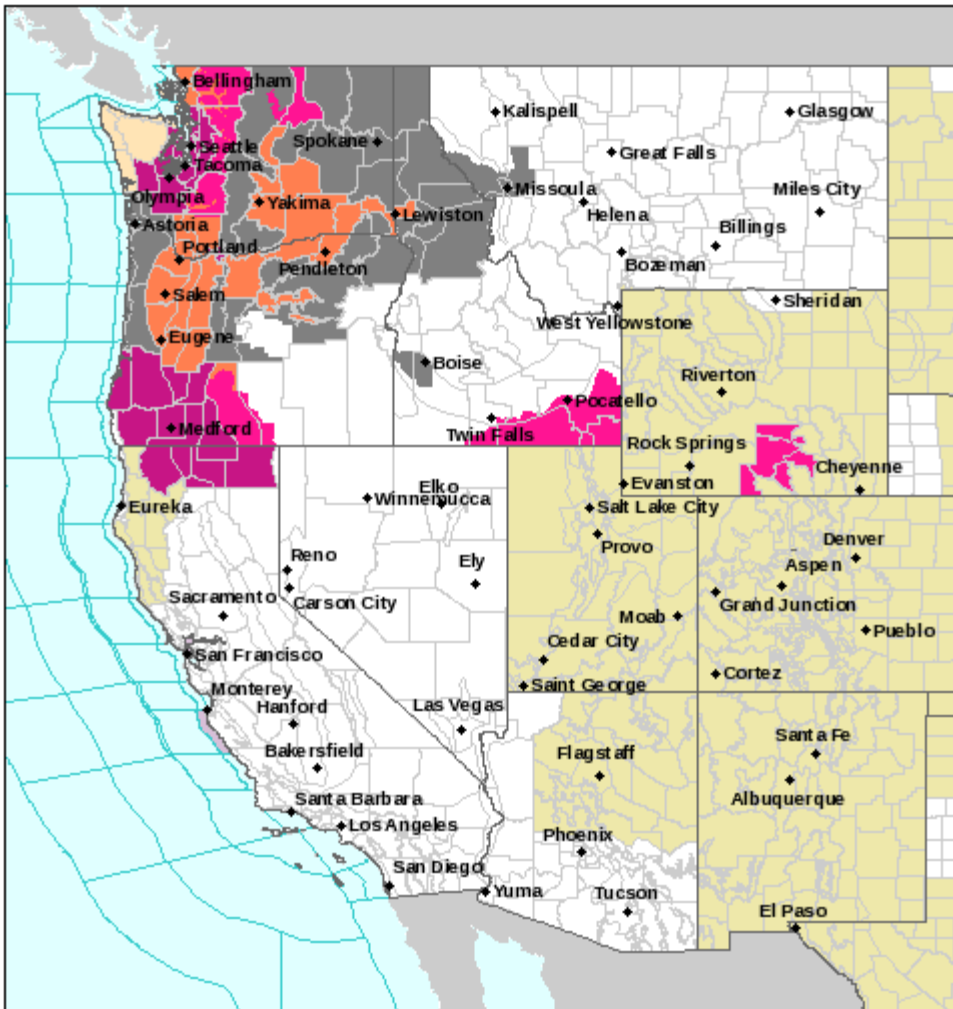

The coastal marine layer remains quite thin North of Cape Mendocino with areas producing low clouds south of there this morning. Winds will generally remain light through the end of the week with daily afternoon sea breezes near the coast and some locally gusty afternoon winds in the valleys.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Cooler weather this weekend into the first part of next week.

Very humid conditions will continue over the region as monsoonal moisture lingers over the area. However, a weak low pressure area approaching the Bay Area will turn the flow aloft to the southwest today which should help push the moisture east of the area. High temperatures will continue to be well above normal with highs up to 105 in the central CA interior valleys. Today, only isolated storms are expected in the Angeles, San Bernardino and Cleveland N.F.'s with most storms remaining in the Sierras and Inyo N.F. tomorrow into the first part of next week, scattered showers will develop each afternoon in the Sierras, but the rest of the district should be precipitation-free with relative humidity (RH) levels returning to more normal levels. The marine layer will likely return to the coast by Sunday with stratus becoming quite deep for this time of year by next Monday or Tuesday.
